The 2011 Broad Prize: School District Eligibility Criteria

Districts cannot apply for The Broad Prize. To be eligible for The Broad Prize, school districts must meet certain criteria related to size, poverty and urbanicity. Winners from the previous three years are ineligible (in 2011, Gwinnett County Public Schools, Aldine Independent School District, and Brownsville Independent School District are ineligible). The eligibility criteria are:

- K–12 districts serving at least 37,500 students that have at least 40 percent of students eligible for free or reduced-price school lunch (FRSL), at least 40 percent of students from minority groups, and an urban designation (Locale Code 11, 12, or 21 in the Common Core of Data*). In states where more than 10 districts qualify under this criterion, only the 10 largest qualifying districts are eligible (69 districts met these criteria in 2011).
- In states with no districts meeting the criteria in the bullet point above, the next largest districts in the nation with at least 40 percent FRSL, at least 40 percent minority, and an urban designation, in order to bring the total number of eligible districts to 75. Only one district per state can qualify under this group of criteria (3 districts were included through these criteria in 2011).
- Finalists for the 2010 Broad Prize who did not meet the above criteria (3 districts were included through this criterion). Note: this eligibility will only apply in 2011.
- Winners from the previous three years are ineligible (currently, Gwinnett County Public Schools, Aldine Independent School District and Brownsville Independent School District).
